I just lost 20 minutes in my EMR to prescribe a grape popsicle for a patient. Yes, I have to prescribe popsicles. Yes, they are in EMR. Yes, I can prescribe different routes for the popsicle (including intraocular).

With health as a common good, and care as a human achievement, healthcare data and the means to draw knowledge from it must be public goods; no entity should be allowed to privatize these, limit access, and create false scarcities for their own profit.

First #Ebola vaccine approved in #Europe today. Meanwhile in #Congo #DRC the Ebola epidemic goes on: more than of 3000 cases, more than 2000 deaths. What is going wrong?

Come contrastare, anche tramite l'ascolto, fuga da terapie salvavita verso ciarlatani e improvvisatori della c.d. medicina alternativa. Esiste una sola #medicina, basata su evidenze scientifiche, giudizio del curante e valori del paziente

Medical publishing awash in fake journals producing big profits publishing fake papers. Nothing more absurd/cynical than Elsevier starting new fake journal "Biomarkers in Psychiatry" when 40 yrs intense research haven't found any. Each new journal degrades noise/signal ratio.

Canada has some medical marketing for fringe stuff; ie: "facelift medicine" or "executive checkups" but you won't see hospitals, cancer care centres or anything essential being advertised here. There is no 'market' to market for anything lifesaving...

How to spot bullshit health claims

1	Just because a treatment is popular or old does not mean it's beneficial or safe.	4	Beware of conflicts of interest – they can lead to misleading claims about treatments.
2	New, brand-name, or more expensive treatments may not be better than older ones.	5	Personal experiences, expert opinions, and anecdotes aren't a reliable basis for assessing the effects of most treatments.
3	Treatments usually come with both harms and benefits.	6	Instead, health claims should be based on high-quality, randomized controlled trials.
